The Journey of Coir

Coconut trees crop every 2-3 months, producing up to 100 coconuts per year

Coconuts are shipped to our factory, which is a member of SEDEX to ensure great working conditions

Husks are decorticated into coir pith and fibre, or chipped

Coir is dried naturally using the sun

Coir is washed using only commercial or rainwater to reduce EC (Salts).
Zero potable water!

Coir is screened into grades

Coir is compressed into blocks

Coir is shipped to the UK (and other countries); uses less carbon than shipping bark from Scotland to Liverpool by truck

Coir is expanded using only captured rainwater.
Zero potable water!

Gardeners grow awesome plants!

We offset all the carbon we cannot eliminate

Coir is packed as Coco & Coir bagged compost or blended with other sustainable ingredients to make Harmony Gardens

The truth about coir, just how sustainable is it?

Our coir is a by-product of the coconut production industries in India and Sri Lanka.

As a by-product, it was previously a material that would go to waste but took a long time to degrade naturally due to high lignin content. If left on the side of the road or in landfill it would remain for decades, adding to pollution of water bodies, or if burned adding to greenhouses gases.

By using this material as an ingredient in growing media, this reduces the amount going to waste.

Coir is an amazing peat replacement, as an ingredient, coir has the capacity for storing more water than other mediums, allows for greater aeration around plant roots, and can be delivered dried and compressed to take up less weight and space in transport. Additionally, it is completely renewable with an average coconut tree re-cropping every 40-60 days.

But doesn't it use huge amounts of potable water?

The short answer is no, for washing in India either rainwater is used or commercial water. Commercial water is water designated for the coir industry only after all of the needs of human supply and that of agriculture are fulfilled.

The wastewater gets pumped to a nearby plantation to water the coconut trees, it has been for decades, so no issue there either.

When we expand the coir in the UK we only use captured rainwater, so in total, zero potable water.

But it must have a huge carbon footprint being shipped halfway around the world?

Not at all, coir is dried and compressed before shipping so we get 360m<sup>3</sup> on a single container and the ships can carry up to 14,000 containers. In fact, per cubic metre of the substrate, you produce 40% less carbon shipping coir from India to Liverpool than you do moving bark from Scotland by truck to the same destination. On top of that Southern Trident offsets all of the carbon that we cannot eradicate from our supply chain, so uniquely as a growing media company we are carbon neutral.

What about the workers, how well are they looked after?

Well we've met a few and they seem happy but that's not good enough, we and our factory in India are members of SEDEX so we can manage and assess our social and environmental supply chain to ensure we comply with the highest standards.

Additionally all of our coir is Responsibly Sourced, Southern Trident are a founding member of the scheme and it allows us to further evidence just how sustainable our material is.
