

PEREGRINE CREAMWARE

Our Story

Peregrine Creamware is a family run business started by myself and my wife, Joanne. Let us tell you how our story began for our small pottery business.

Pottery ran through my veins but instead of blood you'd probably find slip. My grandfather worked as a Saggar Maker's Bottom Knocker filling up the bottle kilns you may still see standing today.

Born in Stoke, I never had a master plan when I left school but I had a willingness to work. Spode was the first stop on my journey and my fate was decided by the factory manager, so from that day I was a slip caster. Spending years perfecting the art of liquid clay and creating wares using moulds.

Taking advantage of the many thriving pottery factories where I learnt many techniques along the way. My career grew and going from the very first caster for Emma Bridgewater to excelling to a casting supervisor. Having worked there for 35 years, I gained a bucket full of skills and more.

Joanne who has a creative flair and passion encouraged the start of our very own business. With a belief in building a pottery company using traditional methods and keeping it local was an important factor.

With now 14 years working for ourselves, we offer earthenware pottery which is all handmade and hand decorated. There is an art in everything I do from slip casting to keeping moulds in top condition to glazing wares and using many types of machinery including kilns. My moulds are spotless, tools arranged with a surgical precision and I have a motto;
'A clean space equals perfect pottery'.

We use a clay with a cream body which gives a warm homely feel as well as being durable and a glaze which gives a gleaming finish. Using an age old recipe in a blunger to make our slip to a smooth consistency like double cream. Each mould sat on the benches is filled with slip and cast to precision. The wares are fettled and sponged before being left to dry ready for firing.

Placing a kiln is like a jigsaw fitting many different shapes together. Once fired the bisque is then ready to be decorated. Joanne uses a traditional spongeware technique with specially selected sponge which is individually cut with intricate designs.

The designs are inspired by many beautiful elements from the great outdoors, cooking in the kitchen to coastal memories and more. With our shapes we wanted to take traditional designs adding our own stamp on to our handmade pottery. Our pieces are designed for both beauty and function telling a story from a mug which you cherish in your hand over a loving conversation to the colours that fill your home.

Follow us on this journey where we offer beautiful pottery built to last. Now you've read our story you are now officially invested in the wonderful world of Peregrine.
