Invest in the future of mobility

Centaur Robotics, the company behind the Centaur, is seeking investment to bring this ground-breaking, self-balancing vehicle to market. Here Tammy-Anne Oren, a certified occupational therapist assistant, assesses the potential impact of the Centaur.

"I love how streamlined it is and what it can bring to users' feelings of self-worth and independence," Tammy-Anne said.

With nearly four decades of experience, she has witnessed many accidents and injuries from 'swing-aways', the footrests on traditional wheelchairs.

The Centaur's single footplate avoids this and acts as a stable platform. It lifts clear of the ground when the Centaur is underway.

Ageing in Place

"I've had patients who won't use a chair because they've had injuries from 'swing-aways'," said Tammy-Anne, who works in assisted living communities implementing treatment programmes prescribed by OTs.

The Centaur, built by UK-based Centaur Robotics, also fits into the space of a dining room chair and spins in its footprint. The company is in the final stages of closing its funding round and the product will be on the market next year.

"The Centaur will reduce falls," Tammy-Anne added. Falls are a major cause of emergency hospital admissions for older people and cost the NHS in England about £435m annually. They also signal an end to ageing in place.

Restoring Dignity and Independence

Mirrors are out of reach of wheelchair users in some residential homes, said Tammy-Anne. With the Centaur's lifting chair putting them at eye level, users can perform personal grooming tasks that might otherwise be done by a carer, restoring dignity and independence. High shelves and cupboards in kitchens are also safely in reach.

"You see the person, not the chair," Tammy-Anne added. "That does a lot for people's self-confidence."
